BACKGROUND INFORMATION

There is a shortage of egg and sperm donors in New Zealand. In order to support patients requesting donations, fertility clinics have attempted to recruit donors but demand has often exceeded the number of donors available. This has resulted in there being a long wait for a donor (a year or more) and a limited choice of donor.

CURRENT PRACTICE

- Clinics actively recruit donors but a clinic cannot guarantee a suitable donor.
- Donors can decide whether or not to donate to a particular person (under the Human Rights Act).
- It is likely that the availability of donors will continue to be limited, because of the ongoing demand and difficulty with recruitment of donors.
- Counselling is required for donors and recipients
- The fertility clinic reviews potential donors for suitability (e.g. age, important health factors)

One option to address this situation is for people to consider a personal donor, meaning they recruit their own donor, often a family member or friend. Currently about half of donor treatments are from personal donors; clinics encourage personal donors and can support patients with this process

PROCESS FOR FINDING A PERSONAL DONOR

Personal donors can be identified through advertising or through personal networks. Patients are encouraged to ask family or friends first. If this is not possible fertility clinics have a process for advertising for donors:

- the person wanting a donor places an advertisement in an appropriate newspaper or magazine, with advice on content from a fertility clinic (there can be costs associated with this for the patient)
- replies to the advertisement are directed to the fertility clinic
- the clinic facilitates the exchange of information between the potential donor and recipient without disclosing identifying information
- the recipient and donor decide if they wish to proceed
- if multiple donors respond there is potential for donors to be considered for other recipients.

Fertility clinics can also provide donors and recipients with information on legal requirements and greater detail on expectations for both parties, including:

- The law states that no payment can be made to the donor, but some expenses can be covered
- The donor is free to withdraw consent for the use of their gametes (sperm or egg) before fertilisation
- There is a waiting period of 3-6 months before treatment.
